TA little bit of my journey with you now. And as always, until next time, Go Blue.

Dr. King, who gave a speech right here on Janss Steps in 1965 just a handful of years before I became a student-athlete at UCLA, had a tremendous impact on me growing up, as did my father and the great Jackie Robinson. I remember Dr. King’s words of equality and opportunity. I remember my father’s dogged determination in guiding me towards realizing my full potential. And as long as I can recall, because of Jackie, I wanted to attend UCLA — a place I knew embodied the values of opportunity, inclusion and equality; barrier-breaking values that, as a minority, I wanted to experience first-hand.

My time with Dave and the passing of the MLK holiday also made me think back to a piece I recently penned for the Spanish publication La Opinion to commemorate its 90th anniversary. Please indulge me as I share my full potential. And as long as I can recall, because of Jackie, I wanted to attend UCLA — a place I knew embodied the values of opportunity, inclusion and equality; barrier-breaking values that, as a minority, I wanted to experience first-hand.

That is where you make your impact.”

Loyalty. Commitment. Responsibility. Pride. Work ethic. Drive. All summed up in two short sentences by a man whose wisdom far exceeded his pedigree. From that day forward, I understood what it meant to be part of a team. And I understood that if I seized the moment, opportunity would follow.

Ultimately, I earned a baseball scholarship to UCLA. But would I have been a Bruin without first making my impact on Wilmington’s American Legion squad? Not a chance. As my dad used to tell me, “Big-time” is where you are. “I never forgot that. And wouldn’t you know it? It was at one of those very American Legion games that UCLA first scouted me.

Today I have the honor of representing my alma mater as its Director of Athletics. While an undergrad, my father’s words echoed in my head when I seemingly couldn’t take another note in lecture hall or write another word for a term paper. Make your impact. Had I not seen to it that my education was as important as my playing career, none of this would have been possible.

Human nature makes it easy to look past where we are. We get ahead of ourselves. We want what’s next but forget to take care of what’s now. I have been a member of many teams over the course of my life — from my heritage, alma maters, marriage and occupations, to everything else in between.

Whatever team you’re a part of, always remember, ‘big-time’ is where you are. By embracing this one simple saying, you can’t imagine the places you’ll go.

Dave Roberts stepped off first base.

Boston Red Sox fans all over the world held their breath.

The New York Yankees held a one-run ninth inning lead in Game Four of the 2004 American League Championship Series and were three outs away from winning the pennant.

Roberts, sent in as a pinch runner, crouched in a lead. Voices whispered to him. “I had that good angel and bad angel on my shoulders,” Roberts said.

One was former Dodger Maury Wills, a legendary base stealer. “He was telling me, ‘Don’t be afraid to take this chance,’” Roberts said.

The other was faceless. “I was hearing all the bad things and why I shouldn’t go,” Roberts said.

He listened to Wills.

The rest is history. Roberts stole second and later scored on a single by Bill Mueller. What followed was Red Sox folklore, culminating with their first World Series title since 1918.

“There was a lot of anxiety,” Roberts said. But, he added with a laser-locked gaze, “I knew I was prepared for that moment.”

Another defining moment has arrived and, once again, Roberts feels prepared. He was hired as the Dodgers manager in October, becoming the franchise’s first minority to hold that position. This time, the only voices the 43-year-old Roberts hears are singular — his own.

“I do understand that this is a storied franchise that hasn’t won the World Series in many years,” Roberts said. “For me being a part of a new beginning, a new era, with me being the [Dodgers’] first minority manager, is exciting.”

This is the third L.A. Story for Roberts.

Roberts arrived as a walk-on at UCLA in 1990. He left after the 1994 season, having demonstrated his worth. His major league career was in neutral by the time he came to the Dodgers in 2002. In one season, Roberts showed he was an every-day player.

He returns to the Southland on yet another quest. The Dodgers have not won a World Series, or even played in one, since 1988. They had the largest payroll in baseball last season and were eliminated in the divisional round.

Roberts has stepped off first base again.

“I think people tighten up when they come to Los Angeles,” Roberts said. “I exhale a little bit because I embrace this city and its diversity.”

When former UCLA coach Gary Adams first met Roberts in 1990, what he noticed immediately was his size.

“He looked 5-feet-8,” said Adams, the Bruins’ coach from 1975-2004. “I thought it would be good to have a guy on the team I could look eyeball-to-eyeball with.”

The meeting was an effort to create interest in Roberts and was arranged by Butch Smith, his Rancho Buena Vista High School coach. Adams had done this type of meet-and-greet a number of times. But there was something different about Roberts.

“He had this big, bright smile,” Adams said. “I was talking to him about how he was not going to play the first year. He was going to have to be patient. He was going, ‘Yes Coach Adams, I’ll do that.’”

All Roberts wanted was a chance. He had been a three-sport star in high school. He was an elusive option quarterback, gaining 723 yards rushing and scoring nine touchdowns while leading Rancho Buena Vista to San Diego Section 3-A championship. Those football skills caught the eye of coaches at the Air Force Academy.

Roberts received an appointment but was unsure if that was the right path.

“My father was in the Marine Corps for 30 years,” Roberts said. “I didn’t feel like I wanted to go to the Academy to spend my college years, let alone play football.”

UCLA, on the other hand, was appealing.

“When I got to UCLA, it felt like home,” Roberts said. “My teammates, my friends, the people I associated with, the way the athletics department put its arms... around players, it felt like a place I could thrive.”
He did.
Roberts won a starting outfield job as a sophomore and hit .326 during a three-year career. He finished with 109 stolen bases, a UCLA career record.
Every day, he was learning.
“I was an athlete playing baseball in high school,” Roberts said. “UCLA was where I defined myself as a baseball player.”
It was a process.
Roberts was a clean-up hitter in high school and slowly made the adjustment to batting in the lead-off spot. Adams kept after him to hit the ball on the ground and get on base by any means so that he could use his speed.
“His goal was to see five or six pitches every at bat,” Adams said. “That meant he had to pass on some fat pitches, but it allowed the guys on the bench to see the pitcher.”
And Roberts took that job seriously.
“One time, I counted seven pitches before he made an out,” Adams said. “He came back to the bench and I said, ‘Way to go D.R., you got seven pitches.’ He stopped in his tracks, looked at me and said, ‘Coach. I got eight.’ And he was right.”
Roberts graduated with a degree in history, but baseball was his career choice. He hit .353 as a senior and was drafted by the Detroit Tigers in the 28th round. A little annoyed that he went so late, it took UCLA teammate Ryan McGuire to straighten him out.
“I was upset at being offered $1,000 to sign,” Roberts said. “Ryan told me the game would move on without me. He said I should use it as fuel. If I chose not to play baseball, I would lose out.”
Roberts returned to Los Angeles again in 2002, acquired by the Dodgers in a low-level trade.
“There was something exciting about coming back to the West Coast,” Roberts said. “This is where I kind of cemented myself as a major league player.”
Roberts had bounced from the Tigers to the Cleveland Indians, who saw promise in his speed and work ethic. For three seasons, Roberts had shuttled between the Indians and the minor leagues. When he arrived in Los Angeles, he had only 165 total major league at bats.
Roberts hit .277 in 127 games for the Dodgers during the 2002 season and finished third in the National League with 45 stolen bases. He wasn’t satisfied. During the off-season, he would drive from San Diego to Los Angeles three days per week to work with Wills.
All the while, the lessons honed at UCLA never left him.
“I’m from a mixed racial background,” said Roberts, whose father is African American and mother is Japanese. “Going to UCLA for four years, you really see the diversity of the area. People come from all backgrounds and walks of life. That really prepared me for professional baseball, going into those small cities in the minor leagues.”
LEADERSHIP THAT INSPIRES LEADERS.

At UCLA, Optimists lead the way every day, in every way. Catalyzing peace in local communities and around the globe. Empowering tomorrow with technological innovations today. And teaching the world how to rise above with grace and wisdom. Wherever they go, whatever they do, Optimists lift each other up, blaze new paths, and motivate others to push humanity forward.

How will you lead the way?
L.A. STORY

DAVE ROBERTS RETURNS TO THE CITY WHERE IT ALL BEGAN...AGAIN.

The journey took him to one of the iconic moments in Major League history. The Dodgers traded Roberts to the Red Sox in July 2004. He was the right man in the right place at the right time.

Roberts had not played in eight days when he was sent out as a pinch runner in Game Four of the American League Championships Series. The Yankees’ Mariano Rivera, considered baseball’s top closer, was on the mound to finish off the Red Sox. Sharp objects were being hidden in homes throughout New England.

Rivera threw over to first base three times, and nearly picked off Roberts with the third try.

“That kind of got me in to the flow of the game,” Roberts said. “He threw over the third time and I was certain that when he delivered to the plate, I was going to get a great jump.”

He did, slipping his hand under the tag of shortstop Derek Jeter. Moments later, he was sprinting home with the tying run. The Red Sox won in extra innings and won the next three games.

They swept the St. Louis Cardinals in the World Series. Roberts didn’t get off the bench against the Cardinals, but had done enough to achieve folk hero status in Boston.

Coming to Los Angeles for a third time may be Roberts’ greatest challenge. The Dodgers have won the West Division three consecutive seasons but have stumbled in the playoffs. The combination of high expectations and a high payroll resulted in a change.

The team’s future was handed to Roberts, whose only managerial experience was one game as interim manager with the San Diego Padres last season.

“There is definitely more responsibility,” Roberts said. “But this is something I feel I am prepared for and excited about.”

Roberts’ prep work was delayed after his career ended in 2008. He spent a year as a broadcaster in Boston and another as special assistant in the Padres’ front office; all the while though, he was itching to get back on the field.

He joined the Padres as a coach in 2011.

“The first week I was out there, I knew I was going to be in this game a long time, if this game would have me,” Roberts said. “I loved being a player, but the teaching aspect was something that really got me motivated.”

That was clear to then-Padres’ Manager Bud Black.

“In this day and age, the players were more in tune with so many things,” said Black, who is now a special assistant in the Angels’ front office. “The game hasn’t changed, the personalities and curiosity of players has grown over the last generation.”

Which makes Roberts a good fit, according to Black.

“Dave has the ability to communicate and form a relationship with all types of players and all types of personalities from all kinds of different lands,” Black said. “His ability to relate will make him a good manager. If you’re honest and genuine, you’re way ahead of the game.”

Roberts has been framed as a “players’ manager.” It is a persona he has developed as the game changed.

“Players all want to know where they stand, and they want to know why,” Roberts said. “When I came up, I was kind of, ‘You do this and you don’t need to ask why.’ I’m not a guy who has a bunch of team meetings. I tend to do things individually.”

But, he said, “I make sure to get my point across.”

That was clear to Black, who remembers a game when the Padres’ Everth Cabrera unnecessarily stole third base.

“I was angry, but when I looked over at Dave, I saw he was angrier,” Black said. “He looked at me like, ‘I got this.’ He got after Cabrera a little bit. There is a time you need to confront a player. I always remember that look in Dave’s eyes.”

Now Roberts has brought that look to Los Angeles for a third time.

“UCLA was definitely a big part of me understanding this city,” Roberts said. “I lived here for four years and then I played for the Dodgers for three years. I believe in the people here, and I have history here. To have all that, and be named the Dodgers’ manager, kind of made sense to me.”

BORN TO PERFORM

DANUSIA FRANCIS TAKES GYMNASTICS TO A WHOLE NEW LEVEL

DANUSIA FRANCIS, A SENIOR FROM KENILWORTH, ENGLAND, IS WELL RESPECTED IN THE COLLEGIATE GYMNASTICS WORLD FOR HER INNOVATION AND CREATIVITY. (PHOTO: KATIE MEYERS)

By Michael Ventre

“A SIDEWAYS SIDE AERIAL CONNECTED TO A FULL-TWISTING LAYOUT DISMOUNT” SOUNDS LIKE SOMETHING SO INCREDIBLY COMPLEX AND CHALLENGING IN THE REALM OF HUMAN ENDEAVOR THAT IT PROBABLY CAUSES SOME TO SUFFER CRAMPS OR MUSCLE PULLS SIMPLY BY SAYING IT.

That’s why when Danusia Francis performs it on the balance beam, gasps are audible from crowds and from scads of admirers across the internet ether. A clip of the daring and innovative move has surpassed four million views on Facebook. While the UCLA women’s gymnastics team is talented and accomplished enough to hold a No. 4 national ranking after its first three meets, the dazzling Francis has become the front-woman for this rollicking band of apparatus-bound acrobats.

“I truly believe,” said Bruins head coach Valorie Kondos Field, “that Danusia brings a thousand more people to our home meets. Everywhere I go they say, ‘Is that girl going to be there?’ Then they come and fall in love with the team.”

As a performer, Francis is a natural. Start with the look: With long, curly blond locks, she has the exotic appearance of a Bond girl, if Bond were to tip a martini with someone that tiny and petite. But her personality is anything but inscrutable and mysterious; with a perky smile and an effervescence that is contagious, she can just stand in place and promise gymnastics fans a rousing bit of entertainment.

She’s also British, hailing from Kenilworth, a town of 22,000 in Warwickshire County, which is Shakespeare’s old stomping grounds. Actually, she’s also Jamaican, holding dual citizenship because her dad is from Jamaica.

When you mix in the look, the accent, her straightforward, no-fear, upbeat attitude, and her extraordinary athletic ability, you get a unique world-class act who is as sensational an entertainer as she is an athlete.

“First of all, she’s blessed with this amazing body,” Kondos Field explained when asked what makes Danusia special. “She’s strong and flexible. She’s got these long limbs. Her body lines are so gorgeous. Then you have the exotic look — half Jamaican and half white with blond hair. She walks in a room, and you can’t stop looking at her because she’s so strikingly beautiful. She’s got the whole package.

“And she loves to compete,” Kondos Field added. “She has an innate awareness to connect with the crowd, which most gymnasts don’t because most are not taught to project to the audience. Danusia just does that naturally. She’s a performer. She’s a competitor, but also a performer.”

The coach believes because she exudes such verve and panache that it translates not only into smiles on faces in the stands, but also numbers on the judges’ scorecards.

“It’s a subjective sport,” Kondos Field explained, “so I believe the judges get caught up in a performance if it’s good. Whether they give you the benefit of the doubt, I definitely feel it plays a part. She’s developed a name for herself in the NCAA. It’s hard to deduct with an athlete like this. Judges typically don’t want to deduct. They want to reward for innovative, artistically well-done gymnastics.”

The judges did just that on March 16, 2014, during a tri-meet at Pauley Pavilion that also included Utah State and Bowling Green, when Francis achieved a perfect 10 on the balance beam, her signature event. It marked only the eighth perfect 10 on beam in UCLA history.

“It was really, really cool,” Francis said with a huge smile. “When you finish your routine and see your teammates run toward you, it’s such a good feeling. I remember that really clearly.”

For Francis, the road to a perfect 10 began around five. That was the age when she was first introduced to gymnastics.

“I was really close in age to two of my siblings,” she explained. “That was quite overwhelming to my mom when we were little. So we tried a lot of different activities. When I was 5 we tried gymnastics. The minute I walked into a gym and saw the girls doing flips, I knew that I wanted to do it.”

It should be noted here that Francis has had some bad luck with buildings. When she was 9, she was comfortably ensconced at a gymnastics that was an hour or two drive each way for her mom, depending on traffic and time of day. But word came down that the building was being demolished to put up a parking structure.

Then she went to train at Heathrow Gymnastics Club and continued her education at a boarding school. She called it "the best decision I ever made." Of course, later the boarding school would be shut down because of financial troubles. While she was driving to workouts and competitions and going to school, she gradually became one terrific, well-rounded gymnast.

"I knew (gymnastics) came quite naturally to me," she recalled. "I was training with older girls, so I never thought, 'I'm the best,' because they were better than me. They literally were like eight years older than me. But when I did my first national competition and won, I was like, 'Wow, I'm one of the best in the country in my age group.' That was the moment."

Jennifer Pinches, who is now medically retired from gymnastics but still is involved as an undergraduate assistant coach for the Bruins, grew up in England and has been friends with Francis since they traveled with the national team to Romania when they were nine.

"Danusia has always been very outgoing and confident," Pinches remembered. "She's always fun to be around, so it was easy to be friends."

Pinches recalled that even then Francis just had something special about her, a spark of flamboyance that set her apart.

"She's always been a performer, and she enjoys making her gymnastics unique and creative, which makes her stand out," Pinches said. "She's very interested in making it her own style. She's very bold, and she's always been kind of a rebel. Where other people won't go, she'll go there."

Francis has not competed as an Olympian. Because of her dual citizenship, she could have competed for either country. But competing for England would have required her to begin her quest through that nation's Olympic program, and she felt with her college work she just didn't have time to make that commitment.

She did compete for Jamaica at an Olympic qualifying event, the World Championships, in October, but there was another gymnast there who received Jamaica's one available spot at the subsequent qualifying event, apparently because she already had been more entrenched in that nation's program.

"Maybe I just wasn't meant to do the Olympics," Francis said with a sigh. She did get close to the Olympic experience, however, performing with Cirque du Soleil during the 2012 Games in London. "That was kind of a dream come true," she said.

But perhaps no single item on her credentials will sparkle more brightly than the aforementioned "sideways side aerial connected to a full-twisting layout dismount." The perfect 10 is tough to beat. Others have achieved that number. Yet Francis made that move her trademark.

"All gymnasts are flexible," she said in explaining how she came to try it. "But I'm more flexible than average. Like mostly my legs; they split a lot. So I can do different skills because of that. In elite, you can't switch things up too much because the risk of falling is so big. Especially when you're fighting with others to make the team.

"When I did have a broken wrist I would try it a lot, that one skill," she added, referring to just the sideways side aerial. "Then when I came here, I don't know why, I think because Coach Val's friends mentioned it, I did it."

From there, it evolved. "During one preseason I practiced it a bit," she said. "I could do it, but we decided not to do it in my routine because it's quite a risky skill. Then at the end of my freshman year I made the beam finals. They (coaches) said, 'Oh just put the skill in because it's an individual competition and it doesn't matter if you make a mistake.' Then I nailed it. Then in preseason again our (assistant) coach Randy (Lane) suggested to do it into a dismount."

"That was unheard of, but I thought I'd humor him and try," Francis added. "I said to myself, 'Oh, I can actually do this.' It was so scary to do the first time in competition. And it's still scary every time because the margin of error is so tiny. Going this way you can fall sideways, and going this way is like this-much space. It's definitely a nerve-wracking skill that's cool to pull off each time. I'm really proud."

One interesting side note is that the move requires a moment of hesitation/preparation right before being attempted. And sometimes, to the chagrin of Coach Kondos Field, judges frown upon that pause.

"With the beam dismount," Kondos Field said, "when she first started two years ago, it's really scary and really hard. She's missed a couple of times in the gym, and when she misses it's a bad fall. She waits in preparation to do the dismount. Judges have taken a half-tenth to a tenth of a deduction for a rhythm break. I argue with judges. 'She's doing the hardest dismount in the country and you're not rewarding that?! You're telling a kid they're not making the beam finals because they waited two seconds to do the hardest dismount? What you're telling me is it's better not to be creative, not to be innovative. They're not incentivizing creativity in sport.'"

Yet sometimes it works out. Kondos Field mentioned that Francis was given two 9.95s so far this season.

As a person, Kondos Field easily gives Francis a 10, including style points.

"She's lovely. Absolutely lovely," the coach gushed. "You can tell she grew up with boarding school manners, which are impeccable. As far as character and personality she's a really nice combination of brutally honest, but in a very lovely way. And when you add the British accent, she can get away with saying things girls her age can't get away with."

"She's genuinely appreciative and lovely," Kondos Field added. "She'll stay six hours after a meet to sign every autograph and take pictures with every little girl. She looks at it as a compliment and a privilege. She's very, very confident in every situation she's ever in. She also has a really big heart, and of everybody on the team, she's the one who bursts into tears first. Not just for her. If someone does well on the floor I look over at Danusia, and she has tears coming down her face."

Francis is an English major and has some interest in broadcasting. But she isn't exactly sure what she'll do after her UCLA days are over. "I think I'll travel for a bit," she said.

Whatever Danusia Francis decides to do, given her penchant for showmanship, you can be sure it won't be boring.
Hail the blue & gold

Sherwin-Williams proudly supports the UCLA Bruins
Adam Wright embraces a philosophy of coaching that could probably be distilled down to this one utterance: “The repetition of actions creates habits. If you make good habits, you’ll put yourself in a good position to be successful.”

That approach is not so radically different from legions of successful coaches throughout history, including the late John Wooden, one of the greatest preparers of them all. But for UCLA’s head men’s water polo coach, it is his. He developed that outlook over many years as a player and a coach. And judging by the fact that the Bruins have won the last two NCAA titles in the sport, it obviously works.

But pinning down his feelings over success is a more difficult task. As a player, he helped the Bruins win back-to-back NCAA titles in 1999 and 2000. It was a very different experience, he said, being a participant than it is being an overseer.

“Winning is great. But it was different. It was very, very different,” he explained. “I can tell you that there’s some relief to it, especially when you go through our situation where we had been in three NCAA tournament finals and lost. You question a lot of things. You question, ‘Should I be changing?’”

“For me to see the joy on my kids’ faces after a long haul, some of these guys losing twice in the NCAA finals, that was better than anything,” he added. “It was better than getting a medal around my neck at the Olympic Games, better than anything. That’s what it’s all about. It’s a long haul as an athlete from Day 1, swimming all those laps. But it’s well worth it.”

And that just represents a hazy recollection of events, because shortly after a head coach reaches the peak, it’s a relative blip in time before he has to begin the climb all over again.

“The crazy thing is, as I told my wife, that it’s such a snapshot, he said. “I don’t remember the feeling is so incredible, seeing all these kids work so hard and feel so good about the work they put in to arrive at their goal, that’s what the driver is. As a coach, it’s completely different.”

Players get to go home at a decent hour. Wright often works until 1 a.m. and then rises again at 6 in the morning. “Being a player is easy,” Wright said. “I’m saying the real players who commit to the team and commit to the training and commit to knowing the details, that’s easy compared to the coach who really cares. The coach who’s not going to leave any rocks unturned. It’s so much harder.”

Wright began the journey to this point in Seal Beach, where he grew up and where he first took to the water and later became a lifeguard. Eventually the swim training he received took him into competition, and he discovered water polo.

“A lot of my water polo career took place in Long Beach,” he said. “Around Long Beach they call themselves the Aquatic Capital of America, even some say the world. A lot of it was being in the right place at the right time. You just get lucky who influences you. My coaches that I went through from 12 and under all the way up through college, through my pro career in Europe, I hit the jackpot.

“I had a really influential coach on my 10-and-under team (Klaus Barth, who passed away in 2006 at the age of 57). I enjoyed it. My friends were doing it. I was still playing other sports — baseball, basketball. But when I got to high school I had to make a choice, so I chose water polo.”

Wright starred at Long Beach Wilson and later at UCLA, where he graduated in 2001 with degrees in history and sociology. Shortly after he began serving as an assistant coach at Wilson for both the boys and girls water polo squads. That’s where he acquired the coaching bug.

Wright played on the USA national teams and competed in the Summer Olympics in 2004, 2008 and 2012, winning a silver medal in Beijing in ’08. He also carved out an enjoyable and rewarding career as a player in Europe.

take over the U.S. women’s national team, Wright stepped in. Slowly, he began to put his imprint upon the program.

“The men’s side had gotten into a little bit of a rut,” he explained. “We had been in a tough place. We won in ’04, and then it had been a long time since they’d been back. When I came in, I had been away from here and didn’t know what was going on. I didn’t even know the landscape of college water polo. I didn’t know players. I didn’t know anyone.

“I remember Adam taking me on home visits as one of his assistants because we needed to start getting the right players in place,” Wright continued. “We had great kids here in ’08, but you need to have the right pieces to construct something incredible.”

One of the most important building blocks for Wright was to convince his players they could win any game. That took some time and some doing.

“We changed the approach to the training,” he said. “And the training was extremely hard, but for a reason. You need to build the confidence of the mind. If you don’t have the confidence in your mind, you can never really arrive at a result.”

Arguably the watershed moment for the program occurred in 2012. UCLA played USC in the NCAA final and lost, 11-10. “I think they had won five in row at that point,” Wright pointed out. “But I said, ‘We’re going to get it done.’

“Roster for roster, they were much deeper. But we were getting into the right place mentally. That game slipped away from us in the last 30 seconds. That’s one that hurts. For sure.”

Yet through heartbreak eventually came triumph. The experience in 2012 — which also involved Wright voicing his opinion afterward about the officiating — succeeded for the UCLA men’s water polo program in the old “that which does not kill me makes me stronger” way.

“What a lesson it was,” he said. “I can harp on the same message to the guys and have it go in one ear and out the other. But do you want to see the video? One second can make the difference of your season. From that point forward the training became easier on me because guys really understood the underlying message of, ‘One second can be the difference. One kick. If I ask you to do three breast kicks but you’re only doing two, this can be the difference.’

“They began to train the right way,” he added. “When you begin to train the right way you begin to build confidence. With confidence you believe you can win. It was this evolution that was the single greatest thing for us to arrive at where we are now.”

In 2013, despite having the nation’s best record at 28-4, the Bruins did not earn a berth in the NCAA tournament. But they followed that up with national titles in 2014 and 2015.

“What I can tell you is that champions are made here,” he said. “We have a university committed to winning. We had a group in place — players who had their hearts ripped out — who are committed to winning. That really made the training ground just continue to grow and grow. At this point I believe there are a lot of days where our UCLA pool is the hardest game we have all year, because of the way the guys are going at it.”

Senior Daniel McClintick has been one of those guys. “When I first met him and began playing for him,” McClintick said of Wright, “he was someone who wanted to be the best, always the best in everything he does. He wanted to quote-unquote put UCLA back on top of everybody’s water polo map. He was someone very motivated, really very optimistic, and very competitive.

Being a devoted Bruin may be something innate, or something learned. Being a devoted Bruin carries with it a certain pride in that we excel in the worlds of academia, medicine, engineering, education, and of course, athletics. Being a Bruin devotee by definition means: “a person who is very interested in and enthusiastic about the Bruins.” This has never been more evident than in the case of Joe Kazemi.

As a boy growing up in Iran in the 1960’s, Joe already knew of UCLA. “UCLA was an internationally recognized school,” said Joe. “The school I went to in Iran was an American-Persian school built in the 1920’s right after World War I by an American missionary. The architecture was very similar to the structures at UCLA; they used that same red brick and architectural design. All kids knew of and would’ve given anything to go to a school like UCLA.”

Joe admits that UCLA had the recognizable name, as did Stanford, MIT, Berkeley, Texas, and, as much as he doesn’t want to admit it, USC. But to Joe, UCLA towered above the rest for a simple reason.

“It was an underdog school,” said Joe. “It was rich kids at private schools versus the underdog, and I’ve always loved the underdog. That’s how UCLA was presented to us at that time; as a public school that supports all children versus a private school.”

After attending a French boarding school for three years, Joe, at 15 years old, came to the United States — by himself — on a one-way airplane ticket. His parents sent him to live in a small town in Utah.

“Unfortunately I never had the chance to go to UCLA so I went to high school and to college in Logan, Utah, then moved to California in 1981,” said Joe. “And when I came to California for the first time, the first thing I did was go to Westwood. I’m not kidding — that’s where it started!”

Admittedly, that is when he and UCLA started, and Joe’s enthusiasm and love of the university began to spread. In fact, Joe’s courtship with his future wife, Julie, had its roots in UCLA. Since their first few meetings were double dates, on the first date that Joe invited Julie to himself, he did what any UCLA-loving person would do.

“I took her to Westwood and bought her a UCLA T-shirt.”

Apparently the T-shirt worked, as Joe and Julie have now been married for 31 years. They have two children, Nick, 24, and Natalie, 19, who were raised enveloped in the UCLA culture. Nick, who graduated from UCLA in 2015, was a walk-on for the UCLA men’s basketball team. But as Joe describes it, it was very nearly preordained.

“We loved UCLA so much that Nick was practically brainwashed as a child,” Joe explains. “When he was in fifth grade, he already dreamed of going to UCLA. He wrote in his grade school yearbook: ‘10 years from now when I’m 18, I’ll be at UCLA playing basketball.’”

The Kazemis were supporting UCLA on many levels long before Nick walked on to the basketball team. Longtime residents of Orange County, Joe and Julie have now been married for 31 years. office, which boasts an “all things UCLA” section which includes a rather large John Wooden Pyramid of Success. The Kazemi household also has an area full of UCLA memorabilia.

“I have the two Pauley [Pavilion] seats in my office that are literally autographed by many of the big names of people who played in Pauley; from Kareem [Abdul-Jabbar] to Coach Howland to Russell Westbrook to Kiki Vandeweghe to Gail Goodrich — I know I’m forgetting some but a lot of those guys signed the seats.”

Supporting UCLA’s teams and athletics programs is one way that Joe shows his Bruin spirit, but his involvement encompasses much more. In 2012, Joe joined UCLA Athletics’ Courtesy Vehicle Program, a program that is a necessity for every NCAA Division I athletic program in this competitive age of college athletics. The Courtesy Vehicle Program is comprised of car dealers who generously provide courtesy cars to coaches and top administrators of the athletics department. The program is an important part in attracting and retaining quality coaches and athletics personnel by providing a personal benefit for them. In order to attract the very best coaches and administrators, it is important to be able to offer them the use of a courtesy vehicle. In this respect, because he loves UCLA, when Joe was asked to be part of this program, he answered without hesitation.

“I own several auto repair franchises. The school needed cars so when they asked me about it, I said, ‘Of course.’ That’s how I started in the [Courtesy Vehicle] Program.”

The auto repair franchises of which Joe speaks are Sterling Collision Centers. With locations in Tustin and Newport Beach, these centers specialize in repairing and restoring the highest end luxury cars like Lamborghinis, Porsches and Bentleys.

Being in the Courtesy Vehicle Program is also beneficial to its participants. Because of his generous involvement as a car dealer in the program, Joe has traveled on several away football games, flying with the UCLA football team and coaches. But besides going on away football trips, car dealers in the program receive credit towards their Wooden Athletic Fund membership. This affords them benefits such as priority for football and men’s basketball season tickets, invitations to sit in the athletic department’s suite in Donahue Pavilion for home games at the Rose Bowl, and to events throughout the year — including the exclusive Director’s Dinner — as well as complimentary admission to all UCLA Olympic sport home games. They also get premium benefits such as a personalized parking space at the Rose Bowl and valet parking in Pauley Pavilion for home men’s basketball games.

Joe and his family always attended football and men’s basketball games, but during the four years that their son, Nick, was on the UCLA basketball team, Joe, Julie, and Natalie went to every single home game and just about every road game. He supports the team no matter the outcome.

“I was in Chicago when we were losing badly to Kentucky,” Joe said. “But you have to support the team. I looked at [the team’s] faces, and as a parent and a fan, it hurts when you know you can’t do anything. But having those experiences just makes me stronger as ever as a Bruin.”

So win or lose, Joe will always cheer for UCLA. In fact, one of his pride and joys comes from “his banner.”

“Yes, I’m the guy with the banner,” Joe confesses. “I bought one of those felt [UCLA] banners at the UCLA Store and I would take it on road games and sit behind the benches with it. Knowing that I was Nick’s dad, everyone on the team autographed it, so the banner became symbolic. So when we were on football or basketball road games and we would score I would hold it up so the TV would show it. I have many pictures of former [student-athletes] with that banner.”

But there’s a photo of Joe’s banner that was taken in a place where it’s pretty certain no one has ever photographed a UCLA banner before.

“After a UCLA men’s basketball game where we beat USC at the Galen Center, a few of us went into the USC Bookstore where we stood among all these mannequins in ‘SC uniforms and gear,” Joe explains. “One of my buddies wrapped the UCLA banner around the head of one of the USC mannequins. So there’s one piece of blue – the UCLA banner – in the middle of all the red and gold USC gear in that store, and there’s a picture of me in the middle of that.”

It is obvious that Joe has fun being a Bruin. It is also obvious how much he loves UCLA.

“I don’t do this for the recognition. I do it because I love UCLA.”
UCLA . . . Champions Made HERE!

Check out these excellent accomplishments by Bruin athletes/coaches past and present.

Ka’imi Fairbairn - football
Senior placekicker Ka’imi Fairbairn was recently named the winner of the Lou Groza Collegiate Place-Kicker Award and to the Walter Camp All-America First Team. Both honors were announced on the evening of Dec. 10 at the Home Depot College Football Awards Show at the College Football Hall of Fame in Atlanta, Ga. Fairbairn is the second Bruin to earn the award, joining 2009 winner Kai Forbath.

Billy Martin - men’s tennis
UCLA men’s tennis coach Billy Martin picked up the 500th victory of his coaching career on Jan. 20 when the Bruins downed San Francisco, 7-0 in the team’s season opener at the Los Angeles Tennis Center. Martin, who is in his 23rd season as head coach, becomes one of just four active major-conference coaches to reach the 500-win mark. His finest victory came in the 2005 NCAA Final when the Bruins defeated Baylor, 4-3 to earn the program’s 16th NCAA title.

Javan Torre - men’s soccer
Senior men’s soccer player Javan Torre was selected by the Colorado Rapids in the third round (56th overall pick) of the MLS SuperDraft on Jan. 19. Torre, a defender, is the 68th player from UCLA to be drafted into the MLS, more than any other college. The Santa Monica, Calif. native appeared in 56 games during his UCLA career and becomes the 34th player to be selected since Coach Jorge Salcedo took over the program in 2004.

Josh Rosen - football
Quarterback Josh Rosen is adding to the many honors he received during his stellar freshman campaign in 2015, as he was named the CBS Sports National Freshman of the Year on Jan. 14. Rosen, who was also named to freshman All-America teams by the Associated Press and Sporting News, finished the year throwing for 3,669 yards and 23 touchdowns. He also he averaged 282.2 passing yards per game.

Jill Ellis - women’s soccer
U.S. Women’s National Team head coach Jill Ellis was awarded the Women’s FIFA World Coach of the Year award in Zurich, Switzerland on Jan. 11. Ellis, who recently led the U.S. to its first World Cup title since 1999, is one of just two U.S. coaches to take home the honor, joining Pia Sundhage in 2012. Ellis was head coach at UCLA from 1999-2010, leading the team to seven-straight appearances in the NCAA College Cup (Final Four).

Karch Kiraly - women’s volleyball
The top-ranked U.S. Women’s National Volleyball team, headed by Bruin legend Karch Kiraly, defeated the Dominican Republic 25-19, 25-19, 25-18 in Lincoln, Neb. on Jan. 9 to wrap up a berth in the 12-team field at this summer’s Olympic Games in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Kiraly also got another bit of good news recently when the Pac-12 Conference named him its ‘Player of the Century’ on Jan. 26.
The Wooden Athletic Fund

Karen McClain Invests in Tomorrow’s Champions Today.

Karen McClain is passionately committed to UCLA and supporting Bruin student-athletes through the Wooden Athletic Fund. A 1985 UCLA graduate with a BA in Economics, Karen found her way back to UCLA in 2012 and now serves as Senior Director for Athletics Partnership & Strategic Initiatives for the UCLA Alumni Association. As a student, Karen was an assistant manager for the UCLA Men’s Basketball team under Coach Larry Farmer, which made her college experience, admittedly, that much more memorable. Some years back, she had the opportunity to visit Coach Wooden at his home, where she felt his humble and caring spirit. Knowing how much he achieved and how much others achieved due to his leadership made her awed by his humility. As a result, Karen, a Wooden Athletic Fund donor since 2001, has upgraded her membership two levels to where she is now a member of the Bruin Legends support group. Still the dedicated Bruin fan, Karen has also made significant gifts to the Hoopsters Men’s Basketball Fund, the Women’s Basketball Bruin Elite Fund, the Pauley Pavilion Renovation Project, and the Wasserman Football Center.

The Wooden Athletic Fund is committed to honoring the educational and athletic legacy of Nell and John Wooden.

Together, members of the Wooden Athletic Fund team provide invaluable support for all UCLA student-athletes and every gift has a positive impact on their ability to succeed in the classroom, in competition and in the community.

This funding is directed to the people, places and programs that need it most, allowing UCLA Athletics to act quickly to enhance the student-athlete experience, retain coaches, and seize opportunities.

“Being in college is one of the best experiences in life and, for student-athletes, it is even more rewarding. Student-athletes have trained and competed in most cases since they were young children. Competing on the collegiate level is a reward for hard work on the court, field, track, pool, and in the classroom. Giving to the Wooden Athletic Fund allows me to financially support and hopefully enhance the student-athlete’s college experience.”

UCLA and the UCLA Athletic Department thank the 6,097 Wooden Athletic Fund members, including Karen McClain.
